folder lock can also encrypt windows system files. if you're concerned about the health of your windows installation, you can set up a locker with an offset to protect system files on the disk. these include drivers, the registry, and more. once you're done setting up your locker, you'll have to restart your computer, but you can run it off a usb stick to make the process as quick as possible. if you want to open your files up to other windows users, you can also share folders to make it easier for people to access files without having to store them locally. folder lock doesn't have any more complicated sharing options, however, and its sharing tools are pretty basic. the only other issue that users should be aware of is that folder lock for windows is unprotected against forced decryption. while your data is being decrypted, your file shares will be available to any application that has access to the drive. if you want to encrypt files that are shared by another user, you'll need to set up a shared folder on the windows file server that can be accessed by the other user, in much the same way as folder lock allows you to share folders. the main screen shows where your data is stored, and lists the files you've locked. you can hide, lock, and access them all using a single mouse click. folder lock lite supports drag and drop as well. the program's documentation was patchy. it lists a number of possible locations for the locker file, but doesn't tell you where they are or how to change them. when i asked support, they said that these settings are stored in the registry. but this is a mystery that it doesn't explain. 5ec8ef588b
