For more information, read our privacy policy.Two weeks ago, the Congressional Budget Office announced that its independent analysis of the House health care bill predicts that 23 million people would lose health insurance over 10 years. That's a huge number, so I called Michael Cannon, a Cato expert on health care policy, to make sure I wasn't missing something. "I've been calling this number out since the CBO came out," he said. "It's just not the case that all 23 million Americans will be uninsured." Advertisement: How can that be? "Cannon says the CBO is overstating the costs and understating the benefits," the Washington Post reported. Let's say you and I have a chat about Obamacare. It's important to understand the latest news on Obamacare. So I ask you about it: "How many will lose their insurance?" I'm not going to have to ask you that question because you're a grown-up and you've been on Twitter and Facebook for months. But the way we talk about the numbers will be very different if we use the official health care debate terms: "How many will lose their insurance?" or "How many will become uninsured?" Advertisement: In the official health care debate, a policy change counts as "losing coverage." In reality, a policy change counts as "changing coverage." By that definition, 13 million people who now get insurance through their employers and receive subsidies will lose coverage. What's more, the Supreme Court ruling that allowed states to refuse to set up Obamacare exchanges is, by definition, a "policy change." That's why many of my friends and family in states that are refusing to set up exchanges are now "uninsured."
