Protection of human lymphocytes from ionizing radiation injury by aluminosilicate glass. The ability of four aluminosilicate glass compositions to protect human lymphocytes from radiation damage was compared. Five different reagents that induced DNA lesions were used to define the relative protection afforded by these glasses. These included ionizing radiation, 9-beta-D-arabinofuranosyl-beta-D-arabinofuranosyladenine 5'-triphosphate (araATP), bleomycin, bleomycin plus ascorbic acid, and a variety of nitric oxide donors. Glass compositions tested included aluminosilicate glasses containing a variety of alkali and alkaline earth cations. It was found that quenching of radiation-induced DNA lesions in intact lymphocytes was 1.8 to 2.8-fold more effective for glasses containing Ca, Sr, or Ba than for a glass containing Na or K. Additionally, the effects of heat-treatment of both quenching solutions and lymphocytes were examined to determine whether heat-treatment of lymphocytes provided protection comparable to that observed for quenching solutions. Lymphocytes were isolated from donors with known radiosensitivity, incubated with various glasses for 24 h at 37 degrees C, and then quenched with ice-cold solutions, which were then heat-treated to 95 degrees C before their ability to quench radiation-induced DNA lesions was examined. One glass containing Ba, Ca, Sr, and Na was found to be slightly protective when heat-treated solutions were used to quench radiation-induced DNA lesions, whereas two glasses that are commonly used in clinical dental practice were not protective. Additionally, it was found that heat-treatment of intact lymphocytes in the presence of nonprotective glasses did not enhance their ability to quench radiation-induced DNA lesions. Thus, glass composition appeared to have a significant effect on the ability of quenching solutions and intact cells to provide protection from DNA lesions.
