There are many parental control tools available for the computer, but often the best parental controls come in the form of logging programs. Kids can be the most sneaky and these programs can help you monitor what they do online. This application does more than log, it blocks sites and prevents inappropriate material from being accessed. KidLogger by Chris Paul Nov 16, 2017 KidLogger is a free app that lets you control the internet usage of your children. You can set up a schedule to view your kids' web history in real-time. You can also take screenshots of your kids' computer screen and then control what sites are viewable and whether or not they can access those sites. KidLogger is a simple to use application, and it works with Windows computers. KidLogger is an easy to use monitoring application, which lets you control all your child's activity on your computer, with just a few clicks. First and foremost, KidLogger has a simple and easy to use interface, which makes it a snap for the children to use. You can make any necessary adjustments by selecting from a number of categories, such as time, location, instant messaging and browsing websites. The application can also be run in the background without the child even knowing that it's there, as it works in the background, automatically. It does not disturb the child, neither is it blocking traffic on the network, so even though you can monitor the child, you can also do things on the computer at the same time without the child being aware that their activities are being monitored. KidLogger can monitor the activity of the child's web browser, and allows you to see the URLs that he is visiting. You can also control the privacy settings of the child and restrict access to certain websites. You can also set the frequency of screenshots and the length of time when they are captured and what will happen with them. The application can also record voice and sounds from the vicinity of the PC, as well as the activity of USB drives. A desktop snapshot can be captured on a regular basis, so you can monitor if the child is actually doing homework rather than playing. You can control all these functions, to ensure that you are not bothered at all by the app, while allowing the child to enjoy using his computer as he should. You can even install an add-on to the application, which allows you to scan emails as they are being sent and receive, as well as scan chats, to ensure that the messages are legitimate. How does it work? KidLogger uses a technology called Process Monitor, which can log every file being opened, while Skype's video call logs can be captured using screenshots. All these logs are stored on the computer, but you can review them whenever you want, without bothering the child in any way. Additionally, parents can also log the activity of USB drives, as well as the usage of files and folders on the computer. This could come in handy to monitor if they open suspicious files from someone else's USB, as they might be infected with malware. The application can be installed on all Windows computers, and parents have the ability to decide which data to capture, and from what exact location it should be
