Why Shares of Qualcomm(NASDAQ:QCOM) Are Crashing How the Snapdragon brand has been hurt by recent disappointments. Not everything goes according to plan. It's a lesson that Qualcomm(NASDAQ:QCOM) CEO Steve Mollenkopf and other industry heavyweights never seem to forget. Recently, Qualcomm has had to battle setbacks that include the inability of its QCOM subsidiary to supply the chips in Apple's(NASDAQ:AAPL) new iPhone and the decision of one of the Android chipmaker's major customers -- Samsung(NASDAQOTH:SSNLF)-- to go with Intel(NASDAQ:INTC). Fortunately, Qualcomm isn't going to go out of business. Its position is secure, even though it faces a competitive struggle with Intel. The company is no longer a follower, having spun off its modem chip business into a separate company called, somewhat appropriately, "NXDN." It's a win-win move for Qualcomm. The company can focus more on its core business, the dominant market for mobile processors. Investors will keep their fingers crossed until the new chipmaker begins making headway. There are many hurdles for the new company to overcome. One of the challenges is that it'll be competing against a juggernaut in the smartphone chip business led by Intel, which currently supplies 14 of the top 20 smartphones in the world. Qualcomm sells handsets through a number of other companies, but its chip sales still account for the majority of the company's profit. The new company is also facing tough competition with Samsung and other major Android vendors. There's plenty of choice on the software side as well. Nokia, Huawei, ZTE, and LG feature chips in the smartphones they sell, while Apple has been rumored to be ordering chips from Samsung. Qualcomm faces a tough road ahead, but it won't go out of business anytime soon. The company's fundamentals are sound, and it's actually beating Intel on selling smartphone chips, though the gap is narrowing. One of the biggest reasons Qualcomm
