Adobe has been greatly expanding Photoshop (and now Lightroom) in the cloud, but they hardly mention it because it's obvious there's no shortage of storage space. Besides, cloud storage is the least important aspect when it comes to working with your images. For the iPad Pro, Adobe have really come up with a great way for one-handed artists to use the device without sacrificing control. I've been working with it on-and-off for the last few days, and boy does it feel natural. No small feat for something this big, it's like using a computer with a couple of fingers tied around it. A good friend and I recently tried out the Photoshop on iPad Pro. We used each of the different pen tools, including air brush, in different parts of the image, and we both had big smiles on our faces after the first five minutes...or, more like half an hour. Despite a few small hiccups, we both concurred that Photoshop canvases on the iPad Pro are the real deal with the full power of Photoshop with the iPad Pro's high-resolution display. In the final image, it feels like the canvas is physically in our hands as we draw and paint with our fingers. In some ways, the assessment of apps has become a bit of a game of misdirection. What some publications say about an app is not necessarily a truly fair assessment of the product. In the case of Photoshop on the iPad Pro, the app has come a long way but there's still a lot of work to be done. I hope it's true that this generation of a professional tool for the professional is here. Because if it isn't, Adobe has one more generation of users who will look elsewhere to get those crucial app updates.
